MEMBER PROFILE OF THE MONTH

HEATHER PAULSON

Heather Paulson, who joined the TCCWRT in 2016, was recently voted in as a Director on our Board.

Heather holds a dual membership with both the TCCWRT and St. Croix Valley and “enjoys meeting people who are as interested in history as I am, plus each Round Table speaker enriches my understanding of the Civil War time period.” She feels “the Civil War was really a pivotal point in American history, heavily influencing everything that came after. It would be hard not to be interested in it.”

“I love to read and have always been interested in history. In junior high, I read The Red Badge of Courage and was really impacted by it. When I got to college, there was a course on the Civil War & Reconstruction I desperately wanted to take because of that book. The class was only offered to upperclassmen, but I successfully made a case to be allowed to attend as a freshman. I am so thankful, as the professor retired after the next term and the course was not taught again during my time in school. I wish I had been able to let the professor know how influential the class has been on my life.”

Heather’s great-great grandfather fought with the 12th Wisconsin, in Company G. He was at Vicksburg, was wounded during the Atlanta Campaign, took part in Sherman's March to the Sea, and was part of the Grand Review. She's recently found two other Civil War soldiers in her family, though both are pretty indirect relatives, being great, great, grand-uncles. One of the two was in the 3rd Rhode Island Heavy Artillery. The other was in Company D of the 1st Wisconsin Calvary and took part in capturing Jefferson Davis at the end of the war.

While she's visited several battlefields, Heather is holding out on picking a favorite until she's visited Vicksburg and Shiloh. "Vicksburg was the first action my great-great grandfather participated in. His service is something I have long been proud of, so visiting a site where he served will be special. Recently I've learned a large contingent of men from my hometown enlisted in the 18th Wisconsin at the start of the war. Shiloh was their first battle. It was a very harsh experience, leaving a significant number of them wounded, captured or killed, including the deaths of the unit's captain, major and colonel. Knowing these are my hometown boys and having an idea of what they went through has already changed my expectations of what visiting Shiloh will be like."

Heather enjoys traveling with her mother who has also caught the Civil War bug. While she seriously considered enlisting in the military several times but did not do so, she is proud of relatives who have served. She has discovered ancestors who fought in the Mexican War, War of 1812, and one who was a privateer during the Revolutionary War, licensed by the Continental Congress to harass British shipping.

Heather's goal is to visit all 50 states, having gone to 30 so far. She lives in Eagan and has been working in the commercial insurance field for the past 20 years.

Identifying a Civil War Carbine

Stephen E. Osman

Alma, Wisconsin, on the Mississippi across from Wabasha, hosts a real gem of an attraction. The Castle Rock Museum features world class exhibits of original arms and armor from ancient Greece through the English Civil War. The retired judge who began assembling the collection many decades ago has built a uniquely appealing museum on the bluff above Alma and the Mississippi River. It even looks like a castle on the exterior. The museum is well worth the very pleasant drive down Wisconsin Highway 35, with of course an obligatory ice cream cone at nearby Nelson Creamery. And it's all less than two hours from the Twin Cities. You can learn more here: www.castlerockmuseum.com

The Castle Rock Museum will soon expand its displays to include Colonial, Early American, Mexican War, Civil War and Frontier era weaponry and accessories. My friend, the judge, invited me down to advise.

Gary is an avid collector from youth, having purchased his first Civil War musket at age 10 and firing it using appropriately sized marbles when he couldn't find musket balls. At age 16 he was working as a summer deck hand on the Mississippi River and was laid over in East St. Louis.

Stopping by a local tavern for a meal he noticed a Civil War Burnside cavalry carbine hanging on the wall. He purchased it for a few dollars and brought it back home to Alma where it has been part of his collection for now 75 years.

The serial numbers of some Civil War carbines and revolvers were recorded in regimental and company record books preserved by the National Archives in Washington. Researchers have gleaned those numbers and published them for collectors to attempt to identify which unit, and sometimes which soldier, used a particular weapon. But it is strictly hit and miss, with only a very small percentage of matches.

I offered to look up the Burnside's serial number, but then turned it over and saw a name carved on the stock: FARLING. Now that certainly helps things!

The Burnside carbine was invented by later General Ambrose Burnside and went through several improved models during the war years. It featured an ice cream cone shaped brass cartridge with a tiny hole in the base.

The fire from a separate percussion cap placed under the hammer ignited the charge. The empty brass case could then easily be removed when the soldier lowered the trigger guard to swivel the breech block vertical. Some 55,000 of these carbines were eventually purchased by the Union Army and they were the third most used of the many types carried by mounted cavalymen. The Burnside was easy to reload on horseback and relatively reliable.

A quick look at the US Soldiers and Sailors System web site operated by the National Park Service was the first research stop and easily accessible from my phone while still at the museum. <https://www.nps.gov/civilwar/soldiers-and-sailors-database.htm> There were exactly seven Farlings in the Union Cavalry in units from Indiana, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. I wrote down the names of each man and unit to be checked as soon as I got home.

Back in 1983 Col. Frederick P. Todd published his massive American Military Equipage: Volume II, State Forces. Using information from the Quarterly Ordnance Returns submitted by Civil War unit commanders, Todd and other researchers have identified what companies of what units carried how many of what types of guns, swords and equipment. Todd's book is the quickest way to use those records and I soon checked the five cavalry regiments that were the home to the seven Farlings found on the NPS web site.

Three of the Farlings cavalry regiments carried all or some Burnside's: Obadiah in the 20th Pennsylvania, Joseph in the 25th New York, and George in the 3rd Indiana. But which Farling's carbine ended up on a tavern wall in East St. Louis?

Next stop in the research were the pension files at the National Archives, an index of which is on the internet-based Fold 3 subscription research service. <https://www.fold3.com> Obadiah died in Philadelphia in the mid-1920s so I crossed him off. It then seemed more logical that an Indiana soldier might end up in Missouri or Illinois, so I next did a search on the very useful Find a Grave website with "George W. Farling" and "Indiana" inside quotation marks. www.findagrave.com

To my surprise and pleasure there was George Farling along with a picture of his government Civil War headstone at a St. Joseph Missouri Cemetery! Mission accomplished and I shared the news with Gary who will soon display his childhood acquisition in the expanded museum gallery. But then even more mystery as the headstone clearly reads "2 IND CAV. The Indiana Adjutant General Report with rosters is available online, and no George Farling is shown in Company H of the 2nd. But there he is in the roster of the 3rd, listed as George W. Ferling. The government headstone is incorrect and is a lesson to remember in the future.

The 3rd Cavalry was formed in the fall of 1861 and was unique. Its companies were split into an Eastern or Right Wing of the first six companies, assigned to the Army of the Potomac, and a Western or Left Wing of the last six companies, assigned to the Army of the Ohio and various other commands. Most of Company H was from Clinton County, and that is where I found George W. Ferling, age 17, in the 1860 Census. He was the oldest son of Jacob age 41 and Mary age 37, both born in Pennsylvania. They were farmers with a middle-class personal estate but apparently no land. When teenaged George mustered in 12 September 1861 it certainly removed an important hand on the family farm!

George mustered out in the fall of 1864 and apparently did not reenlist in the veteranized and consolidated unit. During those three years the Western Wing participated in the Battle of Stones River, the Battle of Chickamauga, the Relief of Knoxville and campaigns in East Tennessee, the Battle of Resaca, and operations including the Battle of Kennesaw Mountain, the Battle of Jonesboro and the Siege of Savannah. George Farling's Burnside carbine shows considerable wear from many hundreds of miles on horseback and many skirmishes and battles.

George W. Furling (yet another spelling of his last name) shows up on the 1890 Special Census of Veterans as then living in St. James, Missouri. Per the enumerator he had served three years and 17 days in Company H, 3rd Indiana Cavalry, and was currently suffering from nephritis and chronic diarrhea. By 1900 he had been married for 17 years and was still living in Phelps County, Missouri with his wife and five children, including a 27-year-old from an earlier marriage. He worked as a carpenter and had a mortgage on the house he owned. George was still there when he passed in 1926 in his early 80s. And soon his story will be told at the Castle Rock Museum in Alma, Wisconsin.
